The systemic racism that runs like rot through the structures of the classical music world exists somewhere between broad statistical data and intimate personal disclosure. And right now, in what seems like a promising turn, a range of responses to it — individual, artistic and institutional — feels, at long last, audible.

The week before, outdoor concerts were given the go-ahead too, with safe social-distancing in place. Pending successful pilots – which are currently being carried out with the London Symphony Orchestra, among others – socially-distanced audiences will be allowed to return on Saturday 1 August.. But, after the closures and devastating job cuts caused by the ongoing coronavirus pandemic ...
